DEPARTMENT OF STATE INFORMATION BUREAU ON INDONESIA AND THE SOUTHEAST ASIAN CRISIS

3 Senators Back Program After Tour Of Asia

By JAMES L. THOMAS
Special to The Washington Star
Washington, March 22—Three prominent senators who recently toured Southeast Asia today recommended that the United States should continue its "active neutrality" in the American foreign aid program.

This recommendation by Senators McGee (Wyoming), Church (Idaho) and Moss (Utah) runs counter to the harsh views on Indonesia that have been ascribed to the Clay Committee, the special group named by President Kennedy to take a "hard look" at foreign aid.

While the Clay Committee report, due for release this week, has been cast in news dispatches as being critical of the policies of the Sukarno Government, the three senators took a more optimistic view.

Golden Opportunity*

Assuming that the United States has a "golden opportunity to bring Indonesia within the sphere of real independent and energetic friends," the senators proposed President Sukarno's new emphasis on economic problems rather than the West Irian dispute with the Netherlands has been Nonetheless, they emphasized the need for stabilization of the Indonesian currency and a tightening up of the American aid program with high-caliber officials working with the people in the target areas.

The three Democrats contended that while Indonesia has received financial and military assistance from both the United States and the Communist bloc, "it stands alone in its great determination to dominate by outside forces."

Red China's Shadow

In a seven-page report, the senators stated that the United States sometimes has been concerned about Communism in Southeast Asia and assistance from the Red Chinese shadow.

most important of all countries in the region, which would be the real point. Note that in this category were some of the attitudes toward direct Soviet military assistance to Indonesia.

Therefore, it is important that we take a new, fresh and realistic look at our traditional policy position in every country stretching all the way from Korea and Japan in the north to Malaya and Indonesia in the south.

The report said the impact of Chinese aggression against India has been "mainly salutary" in Southeast Asia because many dissident groups have closed ranks against China.

Noted a fear that "no matter what the Red Communist powers might do, Communist China was destined to rule the area, and therefore some small countries might play along with Peking."

The three senators in discussing other countries urged a reduction in military aid for Formosa, deplored the failure of the Diem Government in South Vietnam to draw popular support, expressed "frustration" over the tightening of the aid program in Korea and lamented the lack of policy alternatives to re-enforcing American commitment in Laos.

In their judgment on the aid program they called for a better priority selection system among countries and within countries, enforcement of former controls on assistance efforts and "constant" reductions in the number of officials.

On the latter point, the lawmakers suggested that a hearing be held in Washington on the personnel question.

While some aid administrators have suggested new laws to permit the "selective removal" of agency employees, McGee, Church and Moss held that "the focal point of this problem seemed
